Academic Profile

I am an empirical economist specializing in the economics of digitalization and artificial intelligence, technological change, firms, skills, and labor markets. My research combines applied econometrics, machine-learning-based measurement, and large-scale administrative and web data to study how new technologies affect employment, wages, firm behavior, and inequality. I have published in leading international journals (e.g. Journal of the European Economic Association, Journal of Public Economics), lead several large third-party-funded research projects, and teach both core economics and specialized courses in Digital Economics, Econometrics, and the Economics of AI.
